

Disney: State has showered it with special favors and privileges

pulled himself out of Iger’s – er, I mean Wile E. Coyote’s – trap and turned the tables on the self-described genius, as the Roadrunner always does. Maybe Disney and Iger will finally learn not to target the Roadrunner. More likely, Disney will continue targeting the Roadrunner until Disney brings complete destruction upon itself.

Pride and hubris are set to be Disney’s undoing. For more than half a century, Disney has been showered by state officials with special favors and privileges. Some of those favors are repayment for Disney’s lucrative bipartisan campaign contributions. Other favors were given in an effort to please an iconic giant corporation. Like many spoiled children, however, Disney now appears to believe it is entitled to do anything it wants without consequences. Disney is now learning the hard way that launching aerobic, high-profile political broadsides against state officials, and vowing to fund state officials’ political opponents is not a smart way to keep the long-running gravy train rolling.

Make no mistake, Walt Disney World needs the symbiotic relationship it had with Florida policymakers more than Florida policymakers need the relationship with Disney. Disney cannot just abandon its multi-billion-dollar Walt Disney World properties in the Sunshine State.

Even if it could, where would Disney relocate? Disney profits greatly from an East Coast theme park presence. Nowhere else in the eastern United States is there such favorable year-round weather, airport access, and available land as in Florida.

Florida elected officials, meanwhile, are finally learning that standing up for their constituents’ interests is more important – and more politically popular – than simply being Disney’s collective lapdog.

Byrd: Phonics improves reading

has been new research that has come out that suggests that the way we have been teaching reading the last couple of decades is not the way kid’s brains learn to read. This research is commonly called the Science of Reading.

With more advanced brain scans and other data, researchers have discovered that for many years teachers were taught a method of teaching reading that missed a key ingredient: systematic, explicit focus on phonemic awareness and decoding skills.

For years, teachers have been taught that a balanced literacy or “whole language” approach to reading was the way to teach kids to read. This method focused on comprehension and made the assumption that if kids understood what the author was trying to communicate, they could figure out the words.

Phonics and word decoding skills were intermittently taught, but there wasn’t a systematic and consistent focus on it because the overall meaning of sentences was the focus based on what experts in the field were saying at the time.

The latest evidence shows that students have to be taught explicitly how to decode words, and that is what good readers do when they get to a word they don’t know in a passage.

That doesn’t mean that comprehension skills and language skills get ignored. It just means that phonemic skills have to play a bigger part and cannot be overlooked as a first line of attack when kids get to unknown words.

In an effort to embrace this new research, OCPS has just revealed a new approach to reading instruction district-wide that puts in place a more balanced approach to literacy with the incorporation of various programs that promote foundational skills in decoding as well as higher level skills in literacy.

Another key component to this new process is that every student will be screened in grades K and 1 for early reading skills. These screenings will provide a Predictor of Significant

Reading Difficulties (PSRD) to include reading disabilities, such as dyslexia, if intervention does not occur; identify potential deficits in the areas of phonological awareness, phonemic awareness, phonics (letter/sound recognition), and word recognition; and provide next steps for reading instruction/intervention planning and support.

With early screening and intervention and implementation of research backed programs, the district hopes to make significant gains in literacy rates for our students. I’m thrilled that we have a school system that is open to learning right along with our students to find the best approaches to teaching our kids.

twenty miles inside of a free state to catch run-away slaves and Cassopolis was just twenty-one miles from the Indiana border.

We could still see homes that had hideaway tunnels, and the whole town was inhabited by mostly black families. So, we were aware of the effects, and causes of slavery, but we were encouraged and motivated by most of the residents and their stories of courage and resolution displayed by many of their ancestors.

Even in Cassopolis, we were joined together by the bond of American Brotherhood. Many of the men had served in the two world wars, and even though their treatment wasn’t always the best, on Veteran’s Day they would march through Cass with pride in their nation, and utmost respect for their banner, Old Glory.

Where have we failed? Simply put, we have failed to show our children that everyone is someone to learn from, and they need to respect everyone they meet. Somewhere along the line, we have stopped teaching the adage, “Live and let live.” You have sovereignty over your choices of lifestyle, opinions, friends, etc., but we need to teach our kids that flaunting those choices to rupture society shows major disrespect to others and their sovereignty over their choices.

We have stopped teaching tolerance. Instead, we teach “My way or the highway!” There is no more discussing a problem. All that is shown by our actions is immediate retaliation, or revenge. We fly off the handle, and become judges, jury, and executioner without control of our own reaction.

This did not happen overnight. This has been festering in our midst for years. As a former “bar hopper” of years ago, we used to get into “knock down, drag out” fights over something that we used to manufacture to justify our anger and our tussle, but no matter who won or lost, we would sit down together and laugh about how it all came about. No hard feelings, no grudge, it was over and forgotten.

The Bible says, “Be ye angry and sin not.” It’s not wrong to be angry. The Bible also says, “Let not the sun go down on your wrath.”

The wrong comes from carrying a grudge. We need to lighten up and teach our kids to control their emotions.

I told my son, when he was having trouble controlling his anger in school settings, that when you feel your anger rising, stop just for a minute and think, “my daddy loves me.” I know that he has overcome most of his anger problems (not all) and is making headway.

Oh, for the days of Yo-Yo performances, and Mumbly-peg competition again. It is up to you and me to teach and encourage by example.

Let us go out and buy a Yo-Yo!
